Bravest of the Brave.

Major Brown congratulated the soldiers of the Third Division that they had lived to see the day and meet with each other again on such a sacred stor. "How meaningless would this spelisk be." he said, "had the men who fought here not been among the bravest of the brave?" No classic, no anthem of praise, no enconium of diety, no Athenian panegyric for heroism on the fields of Marathon, he sectared could too strongly accentuate the valor of the Confederate soldier. "who here fought for his convictions and stood in declarated ranks by his colors until the last gun was fired at Appointance." Eyery measure of commendation which we soldiers of the Confederacy meritch, said, was most generously bestowed by the vetarian in blue. "Ohi my countrymen," Major Brown exclaimed, "It was American yersua American, and it for the disparity of numbers and resources who shall say when Appointant would have come. Therefore, this monument in a tribute to the American solder, no curistics whether it in particular names the Third Division of Gordon's Corps, that defended these lines in the menorable of the presence of the territory within the sign would Pretersburg said Major Brown would
